A Tale of the Blizzard,

The first morning of the blizzard of 1888 my younger sister started for school, and as the storm increased we anxiously awaited her return. About 11 o'clock she was seen coming, and her story follows: When I arrived at the school-house there were so few there we were missed. When quite a distance home the wind blew my univella my hand and a huge drift prevented my covering it. Just then a gentleman came along and said:

"'Never mind your umbrells, little girl, but try and reach home, kindly assisting me to do so."

Here she commenced to mourn for her

Bought Bread with It. To the Edito My sister and I lost our father and mother when very young. We left Dublin for England in 1858 to try and get work, with not much more money than our fares. We had with us an old silk umbrella. We did not like carrying it so we left it on the boat, but one anilors followed us and gave it to us in Liverpool, where we had breakfast. I left it there also, to get rid of it, but a lady followed us out and said we had for-gotten our umbrella, and we had to take
